offers a very interesting inside look at the organization and spirit of a warlord's army, plus the recounting of several important battles in the struggle to control northern China. This book also constitutes a very interesting study of the role of Christianity among China's fighting men.

An account of China and Germany's diplomatic relations from 1898 to 1930's with a description of relations before 1898. The author offers discussion on the admission of Kiaochow by Germany. Germany's participation in the Boxer Expedition; China. Germany and the World War, and German cultural, commercial, and industrial enterprises in China "The author purpose of writing this dissertation is twofold: first, to present historical facts as they are in the diplomatic relations between China and Germany during the different periods alter 1898; and second, to disclose to the world the example of Germany whose aggressive policy toward China in the beginning had left nothing of permanent value save hatred and animosity, although her new status in China as a non-extraterritorial power has gained her the growth of an amicable feeling between the two peoples and a rapid increase of trade, which none of the special privileges enjoyed by Germany before the World War had been able to procure"

'shen'	olarly rebuttal of Boone's argument that 'God' and 'Elohim' should be rendered in Chi Boone's thesis is that the Chinese knew of no single being comparable to the	God of Christ	ianity and consequently had no word which could be applied to God. Rather, the	v were polyth	eistic and used a general term 'shen' to identify a god or the gods. Boone advocated the a	doption of this	s term into the Christian lexicon for 'God.' Legge attempts to refute every part of E	soone's Shang	ent and to establish that the Chinese were properly monotheistic, did in fact identify the I g-ti' and that 'shen' can only be used to translate the English word, 'spirit' or 'spirits'. Legge	e makes his ar	gument from Chinese texts beginning with the Book of Odes and extending down through	ugh the

This d	iary is a remarkable work, touching as it does. At so many points on vital aspects of Japanese	thought and cu	lture. As already indicated, though the scenery it depicts is localized, it deals notably with eler	nents of though	t that Japan and China have shared in common. The work presents a panoramic view	of both the m	ythology is strictly Japanese, indeed the work is virtually compendium of Japanese folkl	ore and philos	ophy. The two chief shrines visited by the pilgrim are, in turn, Buddhist and Shinto Th	nere are

The K	Kan Ying Pien, a short religious tract of popular Taoism, stands as another example o	of the synerg	getic nature of Chinese folk religion. Webster introduces the use of tracts in Chinese literatur	e and outline	es the origin and nature of popular Taoism. He also discusses the date and authorship of the	e text, noting	g that it is variously attributed to Lao Tze (6th Cent. B.C.). Ko Hung (4th Cent. A.D.), a	nd to unkno	wn authorship in the 15th or 16th century A.D. After an analytical summary of the text, We	ebster

CW4711871499423Day, C. B Chinese Peasant Cults (中國民間信仰-紙神研究). Being4897A Study Of Chinese Paper Gods. (Shanghai: 1940)48

A valuable detailed study and analysis of the importance and function of "paper gods" (ma-chang) in Chinese peasant cults. The paper gods, which are the center of household religious ceremonies, hold the key to understanding the religious attitude of the peasant. In an attempt to interpret the paper gods from the point of view of the peasant and to seek out the origins of the paper gods, the author collected over 2000 paper gods, mostly from northern Chekiang, interviewed numerous villagers, Buddhist and Taoist priests, and searched relevant documentary material from the Chinese classics to modern times. The findings of this investigation are presented in three parts: (1) an introduction to the place of paper gods in peasant cults, the social milieu of village sacrifices, and certain peasant ceremonies; (2) a survey of religious values sought in cult practices relating to temporal, domestic, and spiritual welfare; and (3) a conclusion discussing the affinities between contemporary cult practices and ancient Chinese religion, the syncretic growth of peasant cults, and the disintegration and transformation of peasant cults under pressure from the changes in modern Chinese society. Excellent black and white, and color illustrations.

CW 4711871499485 Chavannes, E. Le T'ai Chan (聖山/泰山), Essai DC Monographic 53 103 D'un Culte Chinois. (Paris: 1910)

A valuable monograph showing the importance of mountains in Chinese religion and the special place of T'ai Shan among the holy mountains of China. Chavannes surveys the religious cult associated with T'ai Shan, describes the manmade structures and physical features of the mountain, offers a variety of translations (historical texts relevant to the Imperial Feng and Shan sacrifices, prayers offered to T'ai Shan from the fifth to eighteenth century, and stone stele inscriptions made by visitors to T'ai Shan from the second century A.D.) to illustrate the historical and religious importance of T'ai Shan, and takes note of popular beliefs concerning T'ai Shan in folklore, particularly the magical properties of the mountain. The appendix to this volume is a separate essay "The God of the Earth in Ancient China," also of great value. In this essay Chavannes discusses the multiplicity of earth gods, the altar of the God of the Earth, the significance of the tree or grove, and the various functions assigned to the God of the Earth. Richly illustrated with reproductions of many of the Chinese texts.

A biography of Bishop Ingle (1867-1903), missionary in Hangchow. Rather than being a narrative the life and work of Ingle, this volume is essentially the publication of his personal letters with son edition, and the letters of family members and fellow missionaries. In this respect this biography is major departure from typical biographical writing about China missionaries. The activities an reactions of Bishop Ingle are presented firsthand without the intervention of time and recall,

This work is composed of four parts. The first part discusses the genealogy and chronology of the princes of the Western Tou-Kiue (T'u-chueh) and also reconstructs the geographical outlines of the Tou-Kiue countries. The second part is a translation of parts of the Sui Shu, Chiu T'ang Shu, and T'ang Shu mentioning the Tou-Kiue. The third part consists of diverse information on the people and countries of the Tou-Kiue. Also included are translations of relevant extracts from the Ts'e Fu Yuan K'uei, an encyclopedia published in 1013. Part Four is an essay on the history of the Western Tou-Kiue. There is a lengthy index of historical and geographical names. This reprinted edition appends the completion of Chavannes' translations from the encyclopedia, Ts'e Fu Yuan K'uei.
